Campaign Methodology

The [redacted] was a December activation for [redacted] staged on the South Bank of the Thames. The centrepiece was a classical-style statue that appeared to turn Thames water into [redacted] a modern twist on Italian artistry and craftsmanship. At a high level, the idea worked on three layers:

Physical spectacle

A striking, unexpected installation in a high-footfall cultural location, designed to stop people and prompt filming and sharing.

Brand symbolism

The statue referenced Italian heritage and design excellence, while the “water into beer” mechanic dramatised [redacted] quality credentials and sense of refinement.

Social-first amplification

The activation was built to travel beyond the South Bank via organic social, influencer visits, short-form video, and PR coverage during a peak seasonal moment in December.

The [redacted] activation generated sustained earned coverage across December, extending the reach of the physical installation well beyond its South Bank location. Coverage was driven primarily by design, innovation, lifestyle, and drinks-focused titles, reflecting the campaign's positioning at the intersection of creativity, craftsmanship, and premium beer culture.

Scale & Reach Context

In total, the campaign generated coverage across 30+ articles, spanning multiple international markets, including the UK, Europe, and North America. While the activation was London-based, the resulting media attention demonstrates how experiential brand activity can travel globally when built around a distinctive creative idea.

Quality over volume framing

The value of this coverage lies less in raw article volume and more in contextual relevance and publication quality. Titles covering the activation typically specialise in innovation, culture, or design, placing [redacted] within environments that reinforce premium brand cues rather than short-term promotional messaging.

Engagement interpretation

Social sharing of coverage articles was modest, which is typical for design and trade-led publications. These placements function primarily as credibility and cultural validation drivers, rather than high-engagement social content. Their role within the wider campaign ecosystem was to legitimise the activation, seed creator discovery, and provide secondary amplification rather than deliver mass social reach directly.

Social Media Performance As Brand Lift

Clear moment-led amplification

The La di / Tap activation is the dominant driver of organic conversation in Dec 2025. One large creator acts as an amplification spike, surrounded by a long tail of UGC.

The Brand Building Index (BBI) is a composite view of brand health signals derived from organic social activity. It brings together multiple dimensions of brand impact, including Visibility, Buzz, Trust, Interest, and Recall, to track how brand presence and perception evolve over time.

Unlike performance metrics focused on immediate action, the BBI is designed to reflect upper- and mid-funnel brand effects, capturing changes in attention, engagement quality, and brand salience driven by cultural moments and amplification.

The BBI does not attribute causality to individual posts or channels, but provides a directional read on how brand signals shift during key campaign periods.

The December uplift across BBI dimensions aligns with observed patterns in social amplification, where one highly distinctive physical moment acted as a catalyst for a long tail of UGC and creator content. Rather than a sustained volume of brand posts, functioned as a social ignition point, with amplification extending the life and impact of the installation beyond its physical footprint.

coincided with a short-term uplift across key brand-building signals, demonstrating how a single experiential moment, when amplified socially, can measurably influence brand visibility and salience.
